I must not dwell too long on the occurrences of the route but leave them for another opportunity at Tabreez from whence I shall have plenty of time for writing fully. On my journey from Taganrog to Tiflis I met with Major Willock the brother of Sir Henry of whom you have already heard during the short time we were together — this gentleman shewed me every possible kindness and certainly the information I received from him does not diminish my hopes of doing well. Every body I have seen here praises in the highest degree the conduct of the English throughout the war — the Russian officers who have been at Tabreez all speak with the utmost gratitude of the reception they have met with from the English indeed from all sides I have heard the same opinion respecting my countrymen there — this you may suppose is no small satisfaction to me.

The round I have been obliged to make by way of Taganrok has cost me much more than if I had prosecuted my intended route by way of Nimgraha and here I am under the necessity of purchasing horses to take me to Tabreez as the posts which were disarranged by the war have not yet been reestablished. I am obliged to purchase three horses and this together with the increased expense of the journey has obliged me to draw on you hard.

I am much pressed for time as I leave at twelve oclock to night it is now eight. The weather is so hot it is impossible to travel in the day. I have for companion as far as Erivan a young Russian officer nephew of the famous Yermoloff[6] an exceedingly pleasant young man — he is going to join the army under Pa[skevitch][7] which is now directed upon Erzeroum. My next letter shall contain a complete budget of all my adventures since writing, the voyage and journey have been extremely interesting particularly the passage of the Caucasus which is certainly worth coming from London to see.

My bill is for 45/6/3.

[Charles Burgess to his Parents.] Tabreez, July 25, 1828

I only arrived here yesterday so that I cannot enter into particulars. I am at Major Hart's who is certainly one of the finest samples of a true English officer I ever beheld. If he was my Father he could not be kinder to me than he is. Every body here has received me well. Colonel Macdonald, Sir Keith Jackson and all the officers have called and offered their kindest attentions to me. Sadik Bey left here for Constantinople in April and as it appears has contrived to pass his goods through Constantinople and is now on his way to Persia — he writes

[6] General Alexei Petrovich Yermoloff, 1772–1861. He had distinguished himself in the Battle of Borodino, in 1812, against Napoleon, and was in command of the famous Caucasian corps in 1817.

[7] Field Marshal Ivan Fiodorovich Paskevich (Paskiewicz), Count of Erivan, Prince of Warsaw, 1782–1856.
