With regard to Edward I hope you have no doubt I cannot help thinking that had we had a little more confidential intercourse in Lo[ndon] unalloyed by temper we should have perfectly understood each other, and at the same time I much blame myself for in any shape giving way to irritable feeling which never lasted longer than the discussion which gave rise to it.

[CHARLES BURGESS TO HENRY BURGESS] Constantinople, August 10, 1835

We arrived here all well on the 7th inst. and found the Schah already returned having discharged her cargo at Trebizond and the Emma half way up the Bosporus, so that as to time I have managed exactly to hit the mark. My goods per Schah are now on their way to Erzeroum and I go on with those of the Emma which will form the last detachment. The Persian trade is here dull owing to the want of respectability and credit of the Persian merchants, prices in Persia still up and goods of all descriptions are much wanted. Edwards letters are very encouraging on all these points. In politics also a move has taken place very favourable to me; the late Prime minister has been completely disgraced and it is said put to death,[33] and in the course of these changes my most intimate friend to whom I have formerly rendered signal services has become commander in chief of the whole army.[34] Who is Prime minister is not yet decided[35] but it is thought that a person very favourable to English interests will succeed, at all events these changes are very favourable for the Old minister had become a complete Russian and was deservedly hated on all sides. Edwards letters are very cheerful, and he has been going on very well in every respect. I have heard much about him from Kirwan and Moore the two Irish gentlemen of whom you have heard and who have been living some time with Edward. They are very fond of him and are both very gentlemanly nice fellows. You may probably see them in England but certainly not for many months. The Emma has made a pretty good passage out here but poor Twigg[36] has suffered a good deal from the ill tempered brutal conduct of the Captain who has treated him ill in all respects. His character for bad temper is very well known out here and I am much surprized that Hodgson and Powis should have recommended a Captain who was so well known to be the worst tempered man in command of a ship to the Levant. He got the vessel on shore at the Dardanelles, and after having done so behaved excessively carelessly and stupidly about the goods he was obliged to discharge so that even now we are not sure that he has not lost some part of his
