The two partridges I have sent, which were caught in the mountains near Khoee, are male and female, the climate of England ought to agree with them, except that the winters, I should think would be hardly cold enough. During the summer they appeared to suffer much from the heat, but, a thermometer on a north wall in the enclosure where they were stood at 95 for some hours during that day.

I sent the birds off on the 1st inst and I have directed them to my brother, Mr George Burgess' address in London, who will see them delivered to you.

[EDWARD BURGESS TO GEORGE BURGESS] Tabreez, October 13, 1837

I send with this a letter to the secy of the London Zoological Society (mind not the Surry) Bruton St., you will see that I have said towards the end that you will see the birds and the letter delivered to the secy.

Mr Abbott[44] sent home some skins of birds from the neighbourhood of Erzeroum and Trebizonde and the society made him a corresponding member. I should be glad if they made me one too, but I do not expect that they will at least not until I have sent them some more things, however in future I shall send them merely the skins for stuffing sending the birds alive costs so much and is so uncertain. I hope these two partridges reach you safely. They were in good condition when they started and I think they are very curious as they are evidently of the partridge kind altho nearly as large as a turkey, their flesh is said to be high flavoured and tender and to be a cure for the plague! — mind I do not say so only the natives do. These birds do not run as the red legged partridges do but when flushed they rise at once as the grey (English) partridges, but they are very strong in the wing and take very long flights. The only way to nail them is to walk a long way round them and get above them then with good dogs you may get shots at them for they rise well and lie so close when once you are above them that, without dogs a man is very likely to walk past them and then as soon as ever they are uppermost away they go up the hill side again running much faster than a man can particularly on the rocky banks where they are found. The Persians say that the red legged partridge, (kuzil keklik) is finer eating than the grey partridge (chiel keklik) if this is the case it is just the contrary of what is the case in England for I have heard that in Suffolk where the red legs abound they do not consider them good. Hanson will let you know in what ship my two partridges are sent from Constantinople.

Tabreez is now very empty of English, Bonham and Major Cameron gone to Teheran, Col MacIntosh to Tiflis and Odessa, Major Woodfall and Dr Riach to Ouroumia, leaving Mr Abbott, Mr Nisbit and me here. I expect Bonham
