Vittorio De Sica, 73, Dies; Neorealist Movie Director

Special to The New York Times

PARIS, Nov. 13—Vittorio De Sica, the director of such film classics as "Shoeshine" and "The Bicycle Thief," died here today at the age of 73.

He had undergone surgery in recent months for the removal of cysts from his lungs, but family members here said they did not know the cause of death.

Leader of 'New Realism'

By MICHAEL T. KAUFMAN

As he himself once remarked, the life of Vittorio De Sica would have made a poor subject for one of his movies.

"The professional actor," said Mr. De Sica, who had been a professional actor for more than 50 years, "lives the life of a bourgeois, and he carries with him, even in his acting, something of the bourgeois attitude."

Mr. De Sica, a handsome and adored matinee idol and ladies' man, became the highest paid star in the Italian film, performing mostly in musical comedies. Impeccable in his dress, tall and handsome, with a following of adoring women, he was the model of the suave and urbane Roman sophisticate.

He was a collector of art, proud of his Modiglianis, Utrillos and Renoirs. He was a gambler addicted to roulette who frequently lost as much as $10,000 an evening at Monte Carlo.

And yet, in seeming conflict to all this, he was also the film maker who, well into middle age, moved from his highly successful acting career to focus on the harsh, small, painful dramas of the poor. With Roberto Rossellini and Luchino Visconti, he became a leader in the "new realism" movement that developed in Italy after the war.

Mr. De Sica called himself "an artist of the poor," using common laborers and street urchins rather than professional actors, and shooting in streets, alleys and shabby apartments in available light. His cameras picked up the dripping of water faucets, peeling paint and the pestering flight of flies.

In that period, in which he directed "The Bicycle Thief," "Shoeshine," "Miracle in Milan" and "Umberto D," Mr. De Sica once discussed what attracted him to the stories of those trapped in a harsh reality.

Source of Drama

"I love poor people," he said, adding that it was in their lives that drama could be found. "After all, if you exclude adultery, what drama is there in the bourgeoisie."

Of those early films—films that were to be followed by some less lauded and more bourgeois movies—Mr. De Sica said that they grew out of his "basically unhappy" view of the world.

"Life gives me the impression of cruelty. I read the newspapers—crimes, murders, divorces. I do not find evidence of sincerity there. I love humanity, I trust humanity, but humanity has a way of disillusioning me. The pictures I direct are nearly always melancholy. This comes from the contrast between my love and my disillusion."

Mr. De Sica more or less stumbled into the theater against his will. As a child in Sora, a town between Naples and Rome, where he was born on July 7, 1901, he had aspired to follow in the footsteps of his father, a clerk with the Bank of Rome.

His father, a former journalist with many bohemian friends, had other ideas and prodded his shy son to perform, taking him to sing Neapolitan songs to wounded soldiers during World War I.

Still, Mr. De Sica, the oldest of two sons, hoped for the bureaucratic life and graduated from the University of Rome with a degree in accounting. After service in the army, he was casually recommended to Tatiana Pavlova, a well known Russian actress, whose troupe was performing in Rome. Impressed by the good looks of the 6-foot young man, she hired him for a walk-on role as a waiter.

'An Easy Business'

His career on the stage developed and flourished almost casually. "Acting is an easy business that I sometimes find very boring," he said in 1957. Last year, however, he said with a sigh, "If I had continued acting on the stage, I would have become a great actor."

In any case, Mr. De Sica rapidly became a highly successful and, in the opinion of many critics, highly polished actor. By the late nineteen-twenties he headed a very popular troupe with his first wife, Giuditta Rissone. In 1931 he appeared in his first movie, scoring an enormous success playing a romantic young dreamer. He played a succession of romantic young dreamers and developed a passionate army of women admirers.

"Brides left their husbands on their wedding nights to pursue me," he recalled. "Even young girls threw themselves at me. This made me uncomfortable. I threw them out."

Just before the war, he directed his first movie, "Twenty-Four Roses," starring in it as well. It was a conventional comedy that proved a commercial success. During the war he played in several "white telephone" movies, films that centered on the living rooms of the upper classes.

During this time Joseph Goebbels offered Mr. De Sica a post in the Nazi-dominated Italian film industry. Mr. De Sica begged off, saying he was working on a film in cooperation with the Vatican. He dawdled on that film for the duration of the war, finishing it three weeks after the American occupation.

Vittorio De Sica

"What else could I do? I was not a Fascist," he recalled of that time, an era he documented in his latest success here, "The Garden of the Finzi-Continis." That movie was awarded an Oscar in 1972 as the best foreign film. It was Mr. De Sica's fifth Academy Award.

His first Oscar was for "The Bicycle Thief" in 1949. That had been preceded by "Shoeshine," a film shot in documentary style that told the story of the waifs of Rome scavenging and stealing to survive in the wake of war. The film was scorned by the Italian public. "Poor people do not like to look at poverty. It is not surprising," commented Mr. De Sica.

The film languished in obscurity until it was discovered by art-house audiences in New York and Paris. Despite the snowballing success of the film, Mr. De Sica had great difficulty raising funds for "The Bicycle Thief," which took him three years to make. It, like "Shoeshine," was written by Cesare Zavattini, Mr. De Sica's favorite writer and collaborator.

As in his other realist films, Mr. De Sica drew the actors he used from shops, streets and slums. Lamberto Maggiorani, who played the workman whose bicycle was stolen, was a factory worker.

In directing these people Mr. De Sica was often brutal, and at one point in the filming of "The Bicycle Thief" he traded sharp blows with Mr. Maggiorani, who burst into tears. That was the effect that Mr. De Sica had sought, and with the leading man streaming tears he ordered the cameras to roll.

He was often contrite after the filming, and in the case of Mr. Maggiorani he set the man up with a cobbler shop when his movie career ended and when he was dismissed from his factory job.

Directed Sophia Loren

Awards and praise continued for subsequent De Sica films. There were "Miracle in Milan," a fantasy, and "Umberto D," and "The Roof." There was "Two Women" in which Sophia Loren's acting was acclaimed by the critics. Her emergence as a fine comedienne is generally attributed to Mr. De Sica's direction.

Miss Loren and her husband, Carlo Ponti, the producer, were with Mr. De Sica just before he died. His latest film, "The Voyage," in which she starred, opened yesterday in Paris.

In the meantime he continued to act, and in Italy, at least, was more acclaimed for that than for his direction. He also made a number of movies that were, in the view of the critics, less than memorable. Among these were "Indiscretions of an American Wife," "Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow," "Marriage, Italian Style" and "After the Fox."

"It is true," he said, "that I have made movies for money and that they have not always dealt with important themes." He added that in a sense "The Garden of the Finzi-Continis," a story of a Jewish family during the war, had been "a return to serious movie-making."

Mr. De Sica leaves his second wife, the Spanish actress Maria Mercader. He married her in 1968 after adopting French citizenship to divorce his first wife. He also leaves two sons, Christian, a pop singer, and Manuel, who composed the music for "The Garden of the Finzi-Continis."

HAZEL JONES DEAD; STAGE ACTRESS, 79

Hazel Jones, a character actress who made her stage debut in London at the age of 12, died yesterday at St. Vincent's Hospital. She was 79 years old and lived at 347 East 52d Street.

Miss Jones's first appearance was as a young maid in Louis N. Parker's "Pomander Walk." In London, she also appeared with Cyril Maude in "The Headmaster," with Sir Gerald du Maurier in "Raffles," with Frank Craven in "Too Many Cooks" and with Ellen Terry in "Alf's Button," a Nativity play.

Miss Jones had also appeared with Noël Coward, Sir Laurence Olivier, Claude Rains and Leslie Banks.

After appearing in some 50 London productions, Miss Jones made her American debut in 1945 at the Barrymore Theater with Gertrude Lawrence and Raymond Massey in Shaw's "Pygmalion."

She also played at the Shubert Theater with Jane Cowl in "The First Mrs. Fraser" and at Henry Miller's Theater in "The Living Room." In 1958, Miss Jones was in "The Entertainer" with Lord Olivier on Broadway.

Philip Eisenmenger Dead; Standard Brands Executive

Philip I. Eisenmenger, retired vice president of the Standard Brands Sales Company, died Tuesday apparently of a heart attack. He was 65 years old and lived at Manhattan House, 200 East 66th Street.

Mr. Eisenmenger graduated from Fordham College and the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration. A trustee of the College of Mount St. Vincent, he was also a member of the board of the National Coffee Association, the Coffee Brewing Institute and the Tea Association of the United States.

He was also a member of the Exhibitors Advisory Committee of the National Restaurant Association and a member of the Allied Advisory Committee of the American Hotel Association.

Surviving are two sisters, Mary M. Connolly and Sister Catherine Carmela, and a brother, Dr. William J. Eisenmenger.

RITA D. HOWES

Rita D. Howes, a copy editor at Consumer Reports magazine since 1967, was found dead Tuesday at her apartment at 2 Washington Square Village. She was 48 years old. The New York City medical examiner's office listed the cause of death as an apparent overdose of barbiturates.

Mrs. Howes had previously been an associate editor of Hospital Physician; an assistant editor for Scholastic Magazine and editor of My Weekly Reader, a children's news weekly published by Wesleyan University.

Mrs. Howes graduated from the University of Bridgeport in 1959. She was a member of New York Mensa.

Mrs. Howes, who was divorced, leaves a son, David.

ROYAL W. LEITH

Royal Willis Leith, a founding partner in the investment banking firm of Burgess & Leith in Boston, died there yesterday at the New England Baptist Hospital. He was 85 years old and lived in Dedham, Mass., and Fortunes Rocks, Me.

Mr. Leith was a graduate of Phillips Exeter Academy and, in 1912, of Brown University. He later served as president of the alumni association of each institution.

He leaves his wife, the former Katherine Dunham; a son, R. Willis Leith Jr.; a daughter, Mrs. Minot Grose; seven grandchildren, and four great-grandchildren.

DR. LEROY BUTTOLPH

Dr. Leroy Buttolph, a retired research engineer with the General Electric Company whose major work was in the early development of quartz mercury light sources, died Tuesday of a heart attack at his home in Snyder, N. Y., a suburb of Buffalo. He was 83 years old.

A graduate of Kalamazoo College in Michigan, Dr. Buttolph retired from General Electric nearly 20 years ago to become executive secretary of the National Noise Abatement Council, with headquarters here. He held that post for 10 years. His widow, Virginia, survives.

LIELF ROSANOFF

Lielf Rosanoff, a cellist and teacher of the cello, died Tuesday night at a nursing home in Austin, Tex. He was 96 years old and until four years ago made his home here.

Mr. Rosanoff was born in Russia. After coming here, he taught at a number of institution, including Vassar College, the Juilliard School of Music, the Mannes School of Music and the Henry Street Settlement.

A daughter, Lyova Anderson, survives.

PRINCESS OBOLENSKY

Princess Vera Obolensky, widow of Prince Yuri Obolensky, a relative of Tolstoy, died Nov. 6. She was 79 years old. A son, Georges, and two grandchildren survive.

Harry Kalcheim, Ex-Agent With William Morris, Dies

Harry Kalcheim, who retired in 1971 after 29 years as an executive agent with the Willam Morris Agency, died Tuesday at a nursing home here. He was 73 years old.

Mr. Kalcheim's career as a theatrical agent dated back to 1917 and the heyday of vaudeville, when he was affiliated with the Western Vaudeville Managers Association in Chicago. Later he came here for RKO and subsequently booked prominent singers and orchestras into the old Paramount Theater.

When he joined the Morris office in 1941 as a key member of the personal-appearance department, he was the agency's first top executive to become active in what was then the infant field of television.

He leaves his wife, Beatrice, and two sons, Sid and Leonard.

COAST COUPLE PLEAD GUILTY IN BOMB PLOT

PORTLAND, Ore. Nov. 13 (UPI)—A truck driver admitted in court today that he was the "J. Hawker," who tried to extort $1-million from a government agency by threatening to black out the city of Portland.

His wife said she typed and mailed the extortion letters and drove him from some of the power transmission line towers that he dynamited as part of his plot. They said they acted alone.

Judge Otto J. Skopil Jr. of Federal District Court here accepted pleas of guilty to three counts each from David W. Heesch and his wife Sheila, both 34 years old, of Beavercreek, a rural town about 15 miles southeast of Portland. Judge Skopil set Dec. 9 as the date for sentencing the couple.

The couple waived indictment by a grand jury and entered the guilty pleas under an agreement with the United States Attorney's office to limit the charges to those filed today.

Under questioning by the judge, Mr. Heesch said he and his wife set dynamite charges at three high-voltage transmission line towers near Maupin, Ore., on Sept. 24, and three more the next day at Hood River. The blasts were not discovered, however, until Oct. 4.

After the tower blasts, a letter demanding $1-million under threat of blacking out the city of Portland was sent to the Bonneville Power Administration. Mrs. Heesch confirmed that she "typed the letters and mailed them."

New Army Command Head

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP) — Lieut. Gen. Bernard W. Rogers, now Army personnel chief, will become commanding general of the Army Forces Command, the Pentagon says. He replaces Gen. Walter T. Kerwin Jr., the new Army vice chief of staff.

IRWIN SILBERG

Irwin Silberg, a founding partner of Sweet & Co. Advertising, 845 Third Avenue, died Tuesday. He was 45 years old and lived in Livingston, N. J.

Mr. Silberg was secretary-treasurer and general manager of the advertising firm and also of Sweet & Co. Public Relations. For 15 years, he was a member of the faculty of the New School, where he taught advertising production.

He leaves his wife, the former Sylvia Lurie, and three daughters, Linda, Louise and Lurie.

Dr. Thomas F. O'Dea, 58, Taught Religion, Sociology

SANTA BARBARA, Calif., Nov. 13 (UPI)—Dr. Thomas F. O'Dea, a former professor at Columbia and Fordham universities in New York, died last night at his home here of complications connected with Hopkins disease. He was 58 years old.

Dr. O'Dea was a professor of religious studies and sociology at the University of California's Santa Barbara campus for seven years and was also director of the Institute of Religious Studies.

He was the author of "The Mormons," published in 1957 by the University of Chicago Press, and "American Catholic Dilemma," published by Sheed & Ward.

He was a former chairman of the department of religion at Columbia as well as a professor of sociology at Fordham.

DANIEL L. GRODY

Daniel L. Grody, who retired last April as adjudication officer of the New York Veterans Administration Regional Office, died Tuesday of a heart attack at his home, 2196 Merokee Drive, Merrick, L.I. He was 61 years old.

Surviving are his widow, the former Dorothy Bimby; a daughter, Elaine Medary, and two sons, Charles and David.
